Pat's Oath.

(From the Philadelphia Record.) (From the Philadelphia Record.)

They looked rather the worse for wear when they entered Maglitrate Toughill's office and announced in husky Hibernian accents that they wanted to swear off for six months. The magnistrate explained to them the solemnity of taking an oath, and warned them not to do so unless they felt strong enough to resist the raging thirst and live up to their obligations. Each protested his strength of character, and the Bible was produced. Both clutched it at the same time, one with his right hand and the other with his left. The magistrate scowled at the latter. "Take the book in your right hand," he thundered.

"rake the local in your left hand," was the reply.

"Sure, it is in me roight hand," was the reply.

"No, it isn't; it's in your left hand," exclaimed the magistrate. "I don't believe you know your right hand from your left."

"Indade, an' Oi do," replied the Irishman.

"This is me roight hand, for Ot'm left-handed."

The Island of Paragua or Palawan is orth of Borneo, and is one of the most north of Borneo, and is one of the most southern islands of the Philippine group. It is about 250 miles long and 30 miles wide. It is exceedingly mountainous and heavily wooded in the central part. The Spaniards made very little progress in colonizing it. This town is the result of their last effort. It was built in the early seventies and has less than thirty years of history. It is well leaved and well of history. There is not a place between this port and the northern end of the island that contains a store where any of the various things which a civilized man thinks necessary could be bought. One store has since been established here, and, of course, is doing a good business. The southern part of the island is peopled by the Moros, who are said to be in a better condition than are those in the northern end of the island.

The commanding officer of the company stationed here is mayor of the town, and has visited all of the outlying barrios, restoring order and encotraging the people to go to work. A small percentage of the people speak Spanish, but Spanish is all that one needs to know, as there is always someone to be found who can speak it sufficiently well to interpret. The common language of the people is Tagalog or Visayan, but in the south Moro is spoken. These jargons resemble our Indian languages, and abound it harsh, guttural sounds more than they do in Spanish. There is little beauty or utility to tempt one to study them.
